Paper maps to mind maps

- Paper maps are used to organise large amounts of interrelated information.
- They are often called mind maps but unless students can effectively transfer the information from the paper map to their long term memory, they have limited value as a revision tool.
- Focusing first on the structure of the paper map, allows you to add the detail in stages, building up your working knowledge of the topic or material.

Dual Coding

- Dual coding is the theory that for successful retrieval of knowledge you need to combine both words and visual for better revision.
- Simplifying complex ideas by linking word and and visuals improves encoding, this will help students to remember more and most importantly they will then be able to recall the information better in the exam.
